This course will cover important topics and issues of modern social psychology. Main readings are articles from social psychological journals. This course will cover issues such as emotion and cognition, self, group, close relationships, and social psychology and health. For the first month, we will begin by assigning readings for you, but later on you can propose issues for the class to discuss. For that you will need to review relevant literature before you can generate substantial questions or issues. This prepares you for your term paper. We will moderate according to the class size, but each student should have at least one session for his/her chosen issue. “The student of the week” will lead the discussion and send the class one key paper to read one week in advance so that everyone is prepared to give inputs and share thoughts.

七、評量方式 (Evaluation)

For each class session, one student will present this week’s assigned readings. Every student should finish the readings, participating subsequent group discussion, grading the presenter, and submit a one-page "comment" paper each week. Students will turn in a term paper on a social psychological topic at the end of semester.
